Democratic National Convention.

FIRST DAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

A Row to begin With!

The Contested Delegation.

GREAT EXCITEMENT & C.

CINCINNATI, June 2.—At a quarter before twelve, at the signal of the firing of a canon, the convention commenced to assemble, and was called to order by Mr. W. E. Ward, of Georgia, and Mr. Richardson, of Illinois, nominated Samuel Medary, of Ohio, as temporary chairman, which was carried unanimously. Hon. John D. Lawson, called the roll of the delegations ready for the convention. While the call was being read by Mr. English, of Indiana, a sudden roar came from the floor at the close of the convention, and a general rush was made through amidst the dust and confusion, which it was discovered that it was the Benton delegation from Missouri, removed from the hall, and rushing in, headed by ex-Governor Price. For a few minutes a scene of confusion impossible to describe ensued. Members were shouting, running, and shouting, and a general riot was about to take place. After a while quiet was restored, and the reading of the call was resumed.

Mr. Medary, of Maryland, stated that when the credentials of the Missouri delegates were presented, the committee of arrangements gave ticket of admission to the hall, and so did not receive evidence of election, and refused the others. New York appeared with two sets of delegates, but as the committee of arrangements would not admit either, it declined to give tickets to either, unless they could manage among themselves, as was done in the case of the Mississippi delegation. Both delegations from New York were admitted.

Sam. Medary on taking the chair, moved a resolution for the temporary house, and it was adopted even though the first nomination of General Jackson, and had the honor to be a member of that which nominated Franklin Pierce. He concluded his speech by referring to the extended influence he had over the party.

Mr. C. R. Catherwood, of Alabama, and W. F. Ritchie, of Va., were elected temporary secretaries.

A. G. Brown, of Mass., introduced a resolution admitting delegations to seats in the hall.

SKETCHES OF LIFE.

CHAPTER I THE CRIMES OF MURDER.

It has been cynically said that all men feel a secret pleasure in the misfortunes and sorrows of others; and sooth, there is more verity in the remark than is creditable to the human character. The forms in which this malevolent spirit is manifested are, indeed, various; but they all proceed from the unkindness of heart, and are directed to the gratification of the same malignant feeling.

Among the many forms of malice, to which man is subject, few afford more instructive indications of the character and dispositions of others, than the loss of wealth, or the falling into a condition of pecuniary distress. A man may lose a limb, but cords and springs can supply it, he may suffer a moral stain, but plenty of money will buy a passing sort of reputation; but to him, it, no matter from what cause, the banker, the broker, the butcher or the baker suspect his pecuniary solvent.

To incur pecuniary misfortune is the vice of a class of men, a grave crime, and the punishment for such crime is pretty much the same, whether the culprit reached his infamy fraudulently or innocently. He's broken--it's enough.

Now, he was a noble fellow. Every body knew he always had the right stuff in him. Everybody knew during all the time of his struggles with adversity, that he would come out successfully at last. Everybody knew that such a spirit could not be repressed and kept down by misfortune. Everybody, each for himself, took credit for his own sagacity in foreseeing and foretelling the good fortune of him whose lusty courage had rescued himself from a water-harbrace, whither he was going directly. Until we meet again, sir, farewell!

The stranger offered his hand first to Traverse, then to the captain, and so on, now, and an a los pasos d'adverso, señoritas, he passed out of the room with a stately step.

His old friends crowded around him and smothered him with gratulation. It was honoring to human nature, to witness the proofs of kindness tendered him. The hearts of men were enlarged, and softened, and rendered more tender. The grand-duke, who refused to credit him for a sack of flour when he knew the poor fellow's children were crying for bread, now offered to trust him for a cargo. The merchant who denied him a remnant of calico to make up his wife's gown, now solicited his custom, with an intimation that his bills were presented but once, and well knew he would buy no goods on credit. The banks that had thrown out his notes, when money he had given him or saved him, now sent him a loan, to help him out of his difficulties. And what will your poor master do when she hears that her son has run away?

An embrace and tears from you, especially when you're high with gallantry. "Dry your bright eyes--or prepare to shed your tears for the laicos--for the choice of weapons lies with me, and he is my mercy!"

"I have brought this on you by a thoughtless act, and you will forgive me, I hope, when I tell you that I am a bad boy."

"I am a bad boy, but I am a good boy."

"I am a bad boy, but I am a good boy."
